A case-control study in the USA. We examined the potential effect of lifetime use of alcohol, tobacco, and hormone replacement therapy (HRT) on the risk of premenopausal breast cancer in a population-based case-control study conducted in the USA. The study included 609 cases and 613 controls matched by age at diagnosis and place of residence. Cases were women with a first incident diagnosis of primary, in situ, or invasive breast cancer confirmed by pathologic review. Controls were women without cancer. Study measures included use of alcohol, tobacco, and HRT in the 20 years before diagnosis or interview, as well as age at menarche, age at first live birth, number of pregnancies and number of full-term pregnancies, body mass index, history of benign breast disease, and history of estrogen- and/or progesterone-secreting tumors of the ovary. After adjusting for known or suspected breast cancer risk factors, current lifetime alcohol use tended to be associated with higher, and current lifetime smoking with lower, risks of breast cancer. Lifetime HRT use was associated with lower, but not statistically significant, risks of breast cancer. The effects of current lifetime alcohol use and smoking on breast cancer risk did not appear to be independent or to operate through effects on body weight. No dose-response relation was apparent for alcohol use, but there appeared to be a dose-response relation for current smoking.Q: Linq sub query is too big?
