To explore the variety of professional training/educational pathways for physicians. Qualitative research. United Kingdom. Ambulatory physicians and academic postgraduate trainees from general practice, hospital medicine, family medicine, and hospital management. From July to December 2011, interviews were conducted with 54 physicians (23 family physicians, 15 hospital-trained physicians, and 16 hospital managers). All participants were recruited from general practice, hospital medicine, or hospital management posts. Respondents were asked to talk about their transition to work within primary care or hospital medicine, their acquisition of specialist/subspecialist training, and the importance of their professional career choices. Physicians' experiences and motivations were explored, and key constructs of a competitive forces framework (teams, performance, and rewards) were applied to the data. The research team generated a conceptual model, which guided data analysis. Three themes were central to discussion regarding motivation for professional choice: (a) opportunities to learn from peers and colleagues, (b) need for long-term and short-term rewards, and (c) balancing personal and professional needs and values. A fourth theme, "social hierarchies" referred to the need for status and respect among peers and colleagues. Physicians needed specific and ongoing training and support. A flexible and varied professional training and educational pathway was desirable. Competition for positions within primary care and for hospitals as destinations for specialist training should be considered when planning postgraduate medical education.Etanercept and renal disease. A newly available therapeutic strategy for the treatment of patients with early, active rheumatoid arthritis and significant disease activity is the use of etanercept.
